

Sprint2 Retrospective Documentation

Jodie Butterworth

CPT_S 322 Project

Since there are no other members for the meeting, I made a retrospective document.

There are so many required meetings for the project. I feel silly meeting with myself. Meeting with other people who don't work on the project and don't know what's going on isn't very productive either.

I accomplished more this Sprint than Sprint 1. I got most the UI sorted out. Unfortunately, I never did get started on the back-end of the site. It's a large project, and I will likely be fighting to get it done and functional. There may not be much time to improve appearance and user engagement. Also, with only 1 person, the paperwork needs to take a back seat, or there will be no product.

Moving forward, I need to focus on the database and security next. Once the back-end is fully functional, it will be a complete site. There are many other improvements slated on top of that, but that must be the next high priority item.

Looking back at this sprint, I focused more on product than documentation. That's necessary, I think.

At least some of my time-eating personal issues may be going dormant for a while. Though the damage done by that nonsense is likely academically permanent. I am considering leaving Pullman to be rid of the more toxic local problems. (I don't think they'd follow me.) Maybe that doesn't belong in the retrospective, but it does effect the product and the quality of the documentation. Not sure if I should even attend classes anymore. I don't like being watched and followed by strangers.

Not sure if I should bother writing this. It's not the meeting that it was supposed to be. And I could say that attending class just upsets and scares me these days, but I don't think anyone cares about that. This whole project is meeting after meeting, and I doubt I care pass anything with so many impossible criteria. I don't want to go to class with the creepy strange men following me. I don't care who they are.

Well, this concludes the meeting with myself. Database and database access next. More focus on product and less on documentation. And more time into the project in general, when possible. And maybe, time to leave Pullman. Is that the real lesson of this 'meeting'?
